Abstract:

For individuals with bipolar disorder other than spending most of their symptomatic time in depressed phase, they are also exhibiting reduction of psychosocial functioning which contributed to poorer quality of life. This lecture will describe what is psychosocial functioning recovery and why does it important for psychiatrists to manage this in their bipolar disorder patients. From the clinical perspective, the expert speaker will be discussing on the practical approach to monitor functioning improvement and measure quality of life in bipolar disorder patients. This lecture will also provide a review of scientific evidence of bipolar disorder treatment modalities targeting for improvement of psychosocial functioning and quality of life including evidence of antipsychotics and future of other treatment modalities under investigations.
